SUMMARY

The discussion centers on the pressures parents face in raising children, particularly in the context of societal judgment and the desire for control. It emphasizes the struggle between fear, ego, and the unpredictability of parenting, highlighting the challenges of accepting uncertainty in child-rearing.

- Parents often feel judged for their children's actions, leading to anxiety and a desire for control.
- The fear of judgment can drive parents to seek black-and-white solutions rather than embracing the complexities of raising a child.
- The combination of ego, fear of authority, and narcissism can create a toxic environment for both parents and children.
- Many parents oscillate between feelings of superiority and shame, complicating their parenting approach.
- There are no definitive answers or tools for parenting; instead, parents must learn to navigate discomfort and uncertainty.
- Embracing the moment-to-moment reality of parenting is crucial for personal and child development.

where's the parent we say what was the parent doing the kid who shoots up a school straight we judge the parent yes so you're you're so terrified of feeling judged so the kid is yours you own the kid you are terrified of being judged right no wonder you want yes or no either or black or white you don't want to live in a gray area because it is no man's land to raise another Spirit we have no idea who they are who they can be we can't look into the future but we're trying to control control control control so fear with the ego fear I'm going to get judge Authority and narcissism of the ego that they're mind this is the deadliest combination I told you with parents either get them on the ego superiority to fix get the perfect kid or get them into shame this is the deadly combination we live under this is why you want the answer clue the tool

the key there is none now be suspended in the discomfort of this reality it's moment to moment to moment
