SUMMARY

To foster a love for writing in children, it's crucial to avoid certain negative practices that can make the experience daunting. By steering clear of making writing tedious, overcorrecting, and comparing their work to others, parents can help cultivate a joyful writing journey for their children.

- Avoid making writing exercises boring and tedious; it can create a negative association with writing.
- Don't overcorrect mistakes; patience is key as children learn to express themselves through writing.
- Refrain from comparing your child's writing to others; each child's work reflects their unique personality and mood.
- Encourage a positive environment that promotes creativity and self-expression in writing.
- Understand that writing should be a fun and enjoyable process, not a race or competition.

never do this if you want your child to write with joy most children these days don't want to write because of the way it is introduced to them never do these three things if you want your child to write one make writing boring and tedious when you ask your child to write a full sheet of letter a letter b and so on the child's brain creates a memory that writing is tough and boring so next time when you ask your child to sit down to write they don't want to come to you two never overcorrect your child when they just starting to learn how to write imagine if you were to learn how to write in the Chinese characters it would take you some time too be patient it is not a racek if you overcorrect your child this will make your child feel that they can never write and that writing is so tough three never compare your child's writing with some other child writing is also a reflection of your child's personality and their mood levels you must never expect your child to write like someone else because this is like forcing your child to become like someone else
